Wed
3rd

Friends of Bishop's House: 'Temples of Sanitation'

Bishop's House, Norton Lees Lane 7.30pm

Sanitation was the prime environmental concern of developing societies in the nineteenth century. The growth of conurbations, especially in London and the industrial north of England and lowland Scotland, presented local and national government with urgent, desperate problems – water-supply and sewerage.

Practical solutions took most of the nineteenth century to achieve, and in the process of engineering the healthy sanitary condition which later generations take for granted, the politicians, managers and designers of the nation's water-supply and sewerage systems left a wealth of high-quality buildings, gigantic engineering works and attractive landscapes across the country. Details available later at: www.bishopshouse.org.uk
